Social Determinants: What Providers Need to Know

Are you struggling to meet the competing demands Social Determinants of health place on your patients?

○

What is our role as clinicians and providers to address social determinants of health?

○

Social determinants of health (SDOH) are the conditions in which patients are born, live, work, age, and learn. SDOH can have a significant impact on a patient's health and wellbeing. Understanding and addressing SDOH is essential for providers to develop holistic approaches to patient care.

Social Determinants: Being Intentional Matters

Why do nurses and providers need to be intentional in addressing social determinants of health?

Being intentional about addressing social determinants of health is crucial because it helps to reduce health disparities and promotes health equity. It ensures that every patient, regardless of socioeconomic status, has a fair opportunity to attain optimal health. Being intentional about social determinants of health also leads to cost savings because investing in preventative measures and social support is more cost-effective than treating chronic illnesses.
